SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION: The current rules governing conduct on Postal Service property establish the maximum penalty for a violation as a fine of not more than $50 or imprisonment of not more than 30 days, or both. As revised by this notice, the maximum penalty for a violation will be increased to a fine of not more than that allowed under title 18 of the United States Code or imprisonment of not more than 30 days, or both.
 To promote compliance with the regulation and to maintain the deterrent effect, the Postal Service has determined it is appropriate to increase the maximum penalty allowed for a violation of this regulation. The authorized maximum penalty should allow the courts more flexibility in determining the appropriate means of promoting compliance with the regulation.
 The current regulations have not been changed for over 30 years. The current maximum fine does not reflect either the seriousness of some of the infractions, nor the effect that inflation has had over the past 30 years. This current low monetary penalty provision gives the court little flexibility in arriving at a fair and just resolution to an infraction. The revisions to the maximum monetary penalty allow for this flexibility. Further, the revision to the maximum penalty more accurately reflects the range of conduct covered by this regulation.
