

consent to automatically transfer the myRA account balance and related account and personal information to another Roth IRA provider if the myRA account reaches the Transfer Threshold without transfer or distribution instructions from the account holder. Will Roth IRA providers be comfortable opening accounts on this basis?

- What eligibility criteria should Treasury consider in selecting providers to receive automatic transfers?

- Should Treasury impose any specific guidelines or conditions on providers? If so, what types of guidelines or conditions should there be? How long should they remain in effect or should they be indefinite?

- Is there a particular number of Roth IRA providers that should be selected among those that are willing to accept automatic transfers of myRA account balances?

- How would the number of providers on the list affect the willingness of potential providers to participate as recipients of automatic transfers?

- What factors are likely to make a Roth IRA provider willing (or unwilling) to be selected to receive automatically transferred myRA account balances?

- Are there potential requirements that would discourage Roth IRA providers from choosing to be on the list of institutions that accept automatically transferred myRA account balances?

- Are there potential circumstances that would cause providers to wish to decline receipt of an automatically transferred myRA account?

- If there are multiple providers receiving automatically transferred myRA account balances, how should accounts be transferred to providers?

D. Automatic Transfer Provider Fee Structure Questions

- Should Treasury establish guidelines for the types and/or amounts of fees or other charges that providers that accept automatic transfers may charge the account holder? If so, how? What types and levels of fees or other charges should be permitted? How should they be disclosed?

- How would any such guidelines affect the willingness of such providers to participate?

- Should any such guidelines require that all such providers charge the same fees, or should varying fees be permitted?

E. Automatic Transfer Investment Offering Questions

- What types of investment options should providers that accept automatic transfers be permitted or required to offer, and what policies, fees, or determining factors should be considered?

- Should these or other providers be required to provide a default investment option for automatically transferred accounts, and, if so, what should that default investment option be (for example, a target date fund)?

- Should the default investment be different depending upon the characteristics (e.g., age or account balance size) of a particular account holder?

- Should providers be required to offer alternative investment options in addition to a default option? If so, should there be specific criteria for the types of alternative investment options, for example having at least one “safe” (principal-protected) alternative investment option?

F. Other Questions

- Are there key or unique features of myRA that Treasury should consider when selecting providers or that could present a challenge in the context of transfers to the private sector?

- What other operational, legal, or regulatory issues should Treasury be aware of or take into consideration in developing a myRA account balances transfer process?
