

their report on the website. CPSC is exploring whether this extra step in the submission process may decrease the number of published reports. CPSC is considering whether to move to a pre-checked box where permission to publish is granted by the submitter automatically unless the submitter explicitly opts out by checking a box. CPSC staff believes this could increase the number of published reports and increase awareness of potentially unsafe products. The reports that CPSC publishes on Saferproducts.gov are prohibited by law from including personal information, such as name, address, and contact information. Do you have suggestions or concerns about making this change?

12. Given the growth of online retail sales since the launch of SaferProducts.gov and that online retail sales platforms usually include an ability for consumers to provide a product rating or other feedback, how might CPSC motivate the provision of safety-related feedback to SaferProducts.gov as a primary, or at least additional, mechanism for capturing information on consumer product-related incidents?

13. How can the agency encourage the use of SaferProducts.gov among eligible reporters other than consumers, such as physicians, medical examiners, and first responders?

III. Options for Providing Input

Interested parties may provide the requested information through written comments or through oral presentations at a public hearing, or through both methods. Written comments and oral presentations will become part of the public record. To submit written comments, see the information under the DATES and ADDRESSES sections of this document.

At the public hearing, interested parties will have an opportunity to discuss their comments. To request the opportunity to make an oral presentation at the public hearing, see the information under the DATES and ADDRESSES sections of this document. Participants should limit their presentations to approximately 10 minutes, excluding time for questioning by the Commissioners. To avoid duplicate presentations, groups should designate a spokesperson, and the Commission reserves the right to limit presentation times, or impose further restrictions, as necessary.

Interested parties who do not attend the public hearing in person will be able to view the public hearing through a webcast, but they will not be able to interact with the panels and presenters.
